Abstract

In various industries such as aviation and automotive, managing aerodynamic drag is crucial for enhancing efficiency and reducing energy consumption. Skin friction drag, particularly on aircraft wings, poses a significant challenge, impacting fuel efficiency, operating costs, and overall performance. This study draws inspiration from fish, known for their fluid movement abilities, to address this issue. This investigates the aerodynamics of a fish scale array (FSA) on a NACA 66(2)-015 wing model at a Reynolds number ( $Re$ ) of approximately  $2.45 \times 10^5$  under laminar flow conditions using Computational Fluid Dynamics (CFD) and a subsonic wind tunnel. A 3D printed biomimetic FSA film is applied to the wing for experimental analysis. The study focuses on velocity streaks, finding that they play a key role in reducing drag. The results reveal the flow patterns over the fish scale array, particularly in the central regions and areas where the scales overlap. The experiment confirms the presence of both low and high velocity streaks in these regions, leading to a maximum drag reduction of 10.9% attributed to the streak formation in the overlapping FSA configuration. This research sheds light on the potential of biomimetic designs to improve aerodynamic performance in vehicle and aircraft design

Introduction

Nature follows a complex process for all of its signs. Every living species on Earth has evolved over time to adapt to its environment. The natural features of each species are crucial for finding food, avoiding predators, and surviving in harsh conditions. From plants to animals, different species have developed unique characteristics with intriguing functional purposes. Nature doesn't Favor smooth surfaces when interacting with the environment. On the other hand, many human-made designs tend to use smooth surfaces in various structures. Interestingly, each species has its own specific surface texture that plays a key role in its survival, which has attracted the attention of researchers. Some species exhibit non-smooth features, such as the microscale roughness in certain plants that creates super hydrophobicity, ribbed structures on shark skin that reduce drag, hairy surfaces on animals that lower friction, and microstructures on animal feet that reduce surface drag. These natural features can inspire solutions to engineering problems through a concept called "biomimetics."

Methodology

In this study, four different types of fish (i.e., Mozambique Tilapia (Jalebi), Mrigal Carp (Mirgal), Lady Fish (Kizhangan), and Red Snapper (Sankara)) were acquired, and the average dimensions of their scales were compared to select the scale of one suitable fish, namely the Mrigal Carp (Mirgal). The scales of the Mrigal Carp and their array pattern were observed and replicated on a NACA 66(2)-015 wing model. This wing model, integrated with the fish scale array, is referred to as the FSA 66(2)-015 wing model. Numerical analysis of both wing models was conducted within a rectangular flow domain matching the conditions of a wind tunnel test section, at a velocity of 25 m/s and varying angles of attack ( $0^\circ$ ,  $2^\circ$ ,  $4^\circ$ ,  $6^\circ$ ). A 3D-printed FSA film was attached to a NACA 66(2)-015 wing model and used for aerodynamic performance testing. A subsonic wind tunnel was employed for the experiments, with the wing models tested under the same flow conditions as the numerical analysis. The coefficients of lift (Cl) and drag (Cd) for both the NACA 66(2)-015 wing model and the FSA 66(2)-015 wing model, obtained from both numerical and experimental analysis, were compared to evaluate the aerodynamic performance of the FSA 66(2)-015 wing model.

Results

The results from both the numerical and experimental analyses of the NACA 66(2)-015 and FSA 66(2)-015 wing models were evaluated and compared. The FSA model shows a maximum drag reduction of 10.9% at an Angle of attack of  $2^\circ$ . The performance of the FSA 66(2)-015 wing model decreases as the Angle of attack increases, at  $6^\circ$  AOA FSA model shows the least drag reduction of 5.94%. The FSA model demonstrated significant effectiveness in reducing drag over the wing, particularly at lower angles of attack. The wall shear contours from the numerical analysis, when compared to the NACA 66(2)-015 model, reveal a streamwise alternating pattern on the surface of the FSA 66(2)-015, characterized by a combination of low and high-velocity streaks. Due to the formation of these high and low-velocity streaks in the FSA model, flow separation is delayed, which in turn reduces drag formation. Biomimetic FSAs had a negligible effect on the lift performance of the wing model.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the FSA model exhibits commendable aerodynamic performance by reducing drag over the wing, particularly evident at low angles of attack. To harness its full potential, further exploration through visualization tests and rigorous application analysis is essential, paving the way for its integration into future aircraft design and optimization strategies.

IoT BASED SMART BLIND STICK

Kishor.A.B, Abdul Rahman.A, Sowmya.R, Mohamed Imrankhan.J
Department of Biomedical Engineering

Hindusthan College of Engineering and Technology,
Coimbatore, Tamil Nadu, 641032

Abstract:

The Direction Guidance Blind Stick will assist the individuals to navigate and move around in public spaces without any reluctance, as blind people typically employed trained dogs and a simple white stick for their navigation. This project's primary goal is to find nearby obstacles and alert the user to their location and direction so they may choose the best course of action. Using ultrasonic wave reflection, ultrasonic sensors can detect objects in front of them. When an obstacle is present, the ultrasonic sensors on either side of the stick are used to detect it. Once the obstacle is located, the Bluetooth sensor uses speech recognition to guide the direction (Turn Right, Turn Back, Turn Left), and the vibration sensor uses vibration to draw the attention of blind people. This enables us to advise the blind person more effectively on how to safely avoid the impediment in front of him. The major goal of our research is to let blind individuals move with some sort of assistance by assisting them in locating impediments in their path using ultrasonic sensors, guiding them using a GPS module, and communicating with caregivers in case of emergency using GSM technology. The technique we suggested is a practical, affordable way for blind people to become more mobile. To further detect the stairs and holes, we have included an infrared sensor. To help the blind people navigate, the stick is interfaced with Google Maps. Additionally, we developed an app to make it simple for users to contact their friends and family. They may also follow the whereabouts of their friends and relatives with this app. To identify their daily usage car, we also added an RFID tag to this stick.

Introduction:

The Smart Blind Stick is a fully automatic as well as manually operated, low-cost, simple-to-maintain device. It is a cutting-edge tool made for visually impaired persons that allows for precise navigation and cutting-edge obstacle detection. With this device, we offer an enhanced blind stick that makes it easier for those with visual impairments to navigate utilizing cutting-edge technology. Three ultrasonic sensors, a panic button, a navigation switch, Bluetooth, a soil moisture indicator, and an Arduino UNO are all built within the blind stick. Utilizing ultrasonic waves, the three ultrasonic sensors are utilized to find impending obstructions. When the sensor detects impediments, it transmits this information to the user via the microphone device. The Global Positioning System (GPS)-equipped smart stick for the blind carries out the navigation procedure by spotting obstacles in the way and locating the user's location using GPS coordinates. Being completely accurate when using this gadget is not an easy feat for a blind person because it necessitates the user's understanding of the information and ability to respond to it in real time.

Methodology:

This gadget comprises of a microcontroller connected to a body sensor. The microcontroller is connected to the ultrasonic sensor, and the programming was built using an Arduino sketch. A person can walk more confidently by using this Direction guide blind stick. With the use of an ultrasonic sensor, this stick can detect impediments both above and below the user. It then responds to the user by vibrating or by guiding them in the appropriate direction (turn right, turn left, or turn back) using voice recognition. Real-time data is gathered by the sensors, which are connected to the microcontroller for processing. A rechargeable battery powers the whole system. The blind individuals will get at their goal safely thanks to this technology, which will be the finest way to get over their obstacles.

Results:

The potential future developments and trends in Direction guidance smart blindstick offer exciting prospects for enhancing blind people well-being. These advancements could lead to more accurate monitoring and tracking of vital signs.

Conclusion:

Conclusion and future scope It should be noted at this stage that this work has been thoroughly carried out in order to design and implement an articulate walking bolt for the blind. The Smart Stick acts as a versatile interface for easy and comfortable internal and external mobility for visually impaired people in the next phase of more supportive apps. It's safe and affordable. This results in effective obstacle detection within three meters of the user's direction. It offers low cost, reliable, lightweight, low power and efficient navigation with fast, quick response times. The computer is hardwired, but light weight, with sensors and other features. Wireless connectivity between components of the device will enhance the additional features of this instrument and increase the range of ultrasound sensors and incorporate technologies to measure the intensity of obstacles approaching. With this approach, our targets in all of the developing countries were particularly addressed towards visually impaired and blind people. In this analysis the machine built can only sense obstacles and humidity. No holes can be identified with this device or with the form of barrier. Thus, ultrasonic sensor systems, arduino Uno and other tools can be designed for an approach to warn users about the direction of movement by using audio commands. For easy use and flexibility, a vibrator can also be attached. Further enhancements to boost system performance will be made in future. These include: an international system for locating the individual via the GPS and GSM systems in order to reach the parent or caregiver venue. It should be flexible and wide range of handling.
